Chapter 1 What Should an English Teacher Do?

Main Idea

The main idea in this chapter is that the most important part of the teacher's job is to plan, and then planning involves applying the principles of the four strands. According to this principle, a well-planned lesson has four strands: reading, writing, listening, and speaking. Learning from expert reporting and writing, different language study and theory developments. Each strand should go through the same amount of time in a course and should equally cover the same content.

This book is written for teachers of English as a foreign language (EFL). It also contains a brief discussion of teachers of English as a second language (ESL). Teaching English as a foreign language means when the foreign language, English, is not widely used in the particular country or context of the classroom. This teaching situation determines their respective characteristics of EFL.

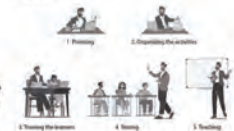

1. The classroom activities may be the only significant source of input and language use for the learners. The teacher therefore has to play a strong role in the organization of learning.

2. Often, there is no clear learning goal. English is learned because it is important, but not because the learners immediately need it for communication. There may be extraneous needs, but they are usually not communicative needs.

3. The language is typically studied as a compulsory subject. Its motivation and achievement may be low. Because of this, materials designed for EFL learners may not be suitable for ESL learners. ESL learners may have a higher level of proficiency and thus more motivated for their own language learning and use.

The English teacher has four main jobs. The first job is to plan and write a course that gives learners a good balance of opportunities for learning and which helps them learn the most useful language features at their present stage of learning. The second job is to organize learning activities such as listening, reading, writing, speaking, grammar, vocabulary, and discourse. The third job is to help them continue their learning and deal with problems that arise outside the classroom. The fourth job is to plan and monitor the learners to find out what they know now and how their knowledge and skills in the use of the language is developing. The fifth job is to teach. It defines teaching normally from, referring to activities where the teacher is the source of information and the learners are the recipients. Typically, in such teaching, the teacher also determines the pace of the learning.

Each of these five jobs requires certain knowledge and skills and the goal of the book is to help you become familiar with these skills and to make you look at each of these jobs in turn.

Chapter 13 Using a Coursebook

Main Idea

The main idea in this chapter is that there are important opportunities for learning that cannot be found in a textbook, so teachers need to use a range of materials. The main one being to deal with the material in the book in the most engaging way. The teacher also does not need to be highly trained. The learners have a clear idea of their progress, so they need to be motivated to learn and eventually move on to the next book in the series. In addition, learners in different classes at the same level can get the same type of learning, regardless of the skill of the particular teacher.

A list of English teaching is there using a set coursebook that is clearly defined. There are several positive features in this. The teacher has very limited responsibilities, the main one being to deal with the material in the book in the most engaging way. The teacher also does not need to be highly trained. The learners have a clear idea of their progress, so they need to be motivated to learn and eventually move on to the next book in the series. In addition, learners in different classes at the same level can get the same type of learning, regardless of the skill of the particular teacher.

There are negative features however. Coursebooks cannot possibly contain all the material needed for a well-balanced course, and they often contain too much material for the level of proficiency the students need to learn.

In this chapter, we will look at what is important in language courses but which cannot fit into a single coursebook. We will look at what could fit into a single coursebook but which is not typically found. Then we will look at how teachers can apply the principles of learning to coursebooks in Chapter 13. We will also look at what is needed for learning to occur in Chapter 11.
